COMMENT

An Incompetent Jurisprudence: The Burden of Proof in Competency Hearings

Brett F. Kinney*

TABLE OF CONTENTS

INTRODUCTION .......................................................................................... 685
I. BACKGROUND ........................................................................................ 688
   A. Due Process Right of the Incompetent Not to Stand Trial ... 689
   B. 18 U.S.C. § 4241 ............................................................................ 692
   C. Cooper v. Oklahoma ..................................................................... 694
   D. Psychiatric Evidence and Burden Shifting .......................... 696
II. THE CIRCUIT SPLIT: UNITED STATES V. ROBINSON AND UNITED STATES V. HOSKIE .................................................................. 698
   A. United States v. Robinson .................................................... 698
   B. United States v. Hoskie ......................................................... 699
III. ANALYSIS ......................................................................................... 700
   A. Allocating the Burden to the Party Raising the Competency Issue Comports with Supreme Court Precedent ........................................................................... 701
   B. Allocating the Burden of Competency to a Defendant Correctly Construes the U.S. Constitution and Medina v. California .......................................................... 705

* Senior Notes & Comments Editor, UC Davis Law Review. J.D. Candidate, UC Davis School of Law, 2010; B.A., Political Science, Legal Studies, UC Berkeley, 2007. Many thanks to Leif Kogel, Jennifer Espanol, Shahtaj Siddiqui, and Lowell Chow for their editorial assistance. Thanks to my friends and family for their love and support. Most of all, thanks to my parents for their pride in my accomplishments, and to my siblings for finding humor in my foibles.
C. Allocating the Burden of Competency to the Government Is Consistent with Placing Other Burdens on the Government

CONCLUSION
INTRODUCTION

Thamin Shawar fraudulently redeemed over 200,000 newspaper and magazine coupons.¹ Three court-appointed psychiatrists determined that Shawar had borderline mental retardation.² Had the Government proved Shawar’s mental competence, he would have faced a twenty-year sentence.³ However, the trial court found Shawar incompetent to stand trial under the Insanity Defense Reform Act of 1984, codified at 18 U.S.C. § 4241.⁴ The Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit ordered Shawar committed indefinitely to a mental hospital.⁵

In Shawar’s case, the Government failed to affirmatively establish that Shawar was competent to stand trial.⁶ As a result, Shawar faced the prospect of life in a psychiatric ward.⁷ The Third, Fifth, and Ninth Circuits would have resolved the case in the same manner as the Seventh Circuit.⁸ Those circuits place on the Government the burden of proof in competency hearings brought under 18 U.S.C. § 4241(a).⁹ In the Fourth and Eleventh Circuits, however, Shawar would have borne the burden of proving his incompetency to stand trial.¹⁰ Failure

---

¹ See United States v. Shawar, 865 F.2d 856, 858 (7th Cir. 1989).
² Id.
³ But see id. at 857 (observing that issue on appeal was lower court’s failure to commit defendant to Attorney General for hospitalization, not question of defendant’s competence).
⁴ 18 U.S.C. § 4241 (2006); Shawar, 865 F.2d at 864.
⁵ Shawar, 865 F.2d at 864; see 18 U.S.C. § 4241(d).
⁶ Shawar, 865 F.2d at 858.
⁷ See id.
⁸ Cf. United States v. Hoskie, 950 F.2d 1388, 1392 (9th Cir. 1991) (holding that Government has burden of proving competency by preponderance of evidence); United States v. Velasquez, 883 F.2d 1076, 1089 (3d Cir. 1989) (stating that Government must establish competency); United States v. Hutson, 821 F.2d 1015, 1018 (5th Cir. 1987) (holding that state bears burden of proving competency to stand trial).
⁹ See Hoskie, 950 F.2d at 1392 (finding that lower court erred in ruling that Government met its preponderance-of-evidence burden); Velasquez, 883 F.2d at 1089 (explaining that factual finding of competency is reviewable under clear-error standard); Hutson, 821 F.2d at 1018 (requiring state to provide enough quantity and quality of evidence to have meaningful hearing).
¹⁰ See Battle v. United States, 419 F.3d 1292, 1298 (11th Cir. 2005) (finding no presumption of incompetence but rather that defendant must demonstrate incompetency); United States v. Robinson, 404 F.3d 850, 856 (4th Cir. 2005) (emphasizing that defendant has burden of proving incompetency).
to prove incompetency would have resulted in his case proceeding to trial and the potential imposition of a twenty-year sentence at most.\textsuperscript{11}

The principle that incompetent persons should not stand trial has deep roots in the common law.\textsuperscript{12} The Supreme Court has recognized that the Constitution protects this principle as a fundamental right.\textsuperscript{13} The circuit courts, however, have split over which party bears the burden of proof in competency hearings under 18 U.S.C. § 4241, with some circuits placing the burden on the Government and others placing it on the individual.\textsuperscript{14} When a party challenges a defendant’s mental competency, statutes provide for psychiatric examinations of the defendant and authorize civil confinement based on those mental health findings.\textsuperscript{15} Scholarly works in this area primarily discuss the meaning of competence and the interaction of psychotherapy and the \textsuperscript{12} See Medina v. California, 505 U.S. 437, 446 (1992) (noting deep roots of common law prohibition on incompetents standing trial); Drope v. Missouri, 420 U.S. 162, 171 (1975) (discussing William Blackstone’s view that courts should not arraign one who becomes “mad” after commission of offense); see also Caleb Foote, A Comment on Pre-Trial Commitment of Criminal Defendants, 108 U. Pa. L. Rev. 832, 834 (1960) (observing that ban on trials in absentia prohibits trial of incompetent defendants because defendant is unable to assist in his defense).

\textsuperscript{13} See Medina, 505 U.S. at 453 (reaffirming long-standing recognition that criminal trial of incompetent defendant violates due process); Pate v. Robinson, 383 U.S. 375, 378 (1966) (finding that conviction of incompetent defendant violated his constitutional right to fair trial); see also Riggins v. Nevada, 504 U.S. 127, 139 (1992) (Kennedy, J., concurring) (explaining that Due Process Clause prohibits involuntary administration of antipsychotic drugs to restore defendant’s competence because due process gives incompetent defendant right to avoid trial).

\textsuperscript{14} See United States v. Patel, 524 F. Supp. 2d 107, 112-14 (D. Mass. 2007) (discussing circuit split). Compare Battle, 419 F.3d at 1298 (finding no presumption of incompetence but rather that defendant must demonstrate incompetency), and Robinson, 404 F.3d at 856 (explaining that defendant has burden of proving incompetency), with Hoskie, 950 F.2d at 1392 (stating that Government bears burden of proving competence by preponderance of evidence), United States v. Velasquez, 885 F.2d 1076, 1089 (3d Cir. 1989) (stating that Government bears responsibility to establish competency), and United States v. Hutson, 821 F.2d 1015, 1018 (5th Cir. 1987) (holding that state bears burden of proving competency to stand trial).

law. However, a dearth of analysis examining the procedural aspect of competency hearings leaves courts with little guidance.

This Comment argues that the party initiating proceedings to determine competency should bear the burden of proof at such a hearing. Part I reviews the constitutional basis for competency hearings, explores the statutory provisions of 18 U.S.C. § 4241 that create procedures and standards for competency hearings, and examines the Supreme Court's interpretation of those provisions. Part I also highlights the confusion that the Court's dictum in Cooper v. Oklahoma created in the lower courts. In Cooper, the Court rejected a clear-and-convincing standard for proving incompetency and noted that the federal government places that burden on the defendant. Part II details the split between the Fourth Circuit's decision in United States v. Robinson, which placed the burden of proving competency on the defendant, and the Ninth Circuit's holding in United States v. Hoskie, which placed the burden of proving competency on the government.

Part III argues that a burden-shifting procedure is consistent with the Supreme Court precedents of Parke v. Raley and Buchanan v. Kentucky, which address burden-shifting procedures and the admission of

---

18 See infra Part III.

19 See infra Part I.A-B.

20 See infra Part I.C.

21 See Cooper, 517 U.S. at 362; infra Part I.C; see also Patel, 524 F. Supp. 2d at 111 (recognizing that courts have found Supreme Court dicta not binding upon lower federal courts).

psychological evidence at trial. It then argues that Robinson's holding allocating the burden of proof to a criminal defendant comports with the U.S. Constitution and the Supreme Court's holding in Medina v. California that criminal defendants in state court may bear the burden of proof. Part III also argues that Hoskie correctly found that the Government may bear the burden of proof, but erred in allocating it to the Government in that case. Part III further explains that a system of allocation premised on the identity of the moving party ensures adversarial proceedings in which each party argues a position consistent with its interests. If the Supreme Court were to resolve this split, it should adopt a burden-allocating procedure that places the burden of proof on the party bringing the motion to determine competency rather than implementing a per se rule.

I. BACKGROUND

The debate over motions to determine competency implicates important personal interests. These interests lie at the intersection of psychiatry, constitutional law, and criminal procedure. A long-established principle of criminal procedure protects incompetent defendants from facing trial. The Constitution establishes this due process protection and 18 U.S.C. § 4241 codifies it.

---

24 See infra Part III.B.

25 See Hoskie, 950 F.2d at 1392.

26 See infra Part III.A.

27 See infra Part III.

28 See generally PERLIN ET AL., supra note 16 (exploring interplay of mental health field and legal determinations); Mann, supra note 16 (discussing right against self-incrimination in context of Supreme Court's approach to psychiatric evidence); Terry A. Maroney, Emotional Competence, "Rational Understanding," and the Criminal Defendant, 43 AM. CRIM. L. REV. 1375, 1381 (2006) (arguing that prosecuting incompetent defendant harms defendant, undermines outcome, and demeans dignity of process).

29 See generally THOMAS GRESSO, EVALUATING COMPETENCIES: FORENSIC ASSESSMENTS AND INSTRUMENTS (2d ed. 2002) (discussing conceptual model for understanding nature of legal competencies); PERLIN ET AL., supra note 16 (discussing ways in which psychiatry and law interact); John W. Parry, Highlights, 32 MENTAL & PHYSICAL DISABILITY L. REP. 488, 489 (2008) (discussing Supreme Court opinion about right to counsel at competency hearings and ambiguous higher standard for incompetency).

30 See Medina v. California, 505 U.S. 437, 446 (1992) (noting origin of common law prohibition on incompetents standing trial); Drope v. Missouri, 420 U.S. 162, 171
A. Due Process Right of the Incompetent Not to Stand Trial

The Supreme Court has recognized that the Constitution’s prohibition on incompetent defendants standing trial is part of the common law heritage. The prohibition may have stemmed from the ban on trials in absentia. According to this theory, an incompetent defendant, although physically available, was not mentally present in the courtroom to proffer a defense. In effect, an incompetent defendant was equally as absent as a defendant who did not appear at all, as neither a physically absent or mentally incompetent defendant could present a defense. The right to present a defense is a (1975) (discussing Blackstone’s view that defendant who develops mental health problems after committing crime is immune from arraignment); Youtsey v. United States, 97 F. 937, 940 (6th Cir. 1899) (explaining that insane person cannot enter plea, go to trial, or receive judgment).

---

32 See Medina, 505 U.S. at 445-46 (observing that criminal procedure reflects centuries of common-law practice, and acknowledging well-settled tradition regarding trial of incompetent defendants); Drope, 420 U.S. at 171-72 (explaining that prohibiting incompetent defendants from standing trial is essential part of adversary process). See generally Youtsey, 97 F. at 940-46 (detailing history of rule against trying incompetent defendants).

33 See Drope, 420 U.S. at 171 (citing Foote, supra note 12, at 834); Edmonds v. Peters, 93 F.3d 1307, 1314 (7th Cir. 1996) (noting that scholars suggest origin of prohibition against incompetents standing trial is common-law ban on trials in absentia); Maroney, supra note 28, at 1381 (noting theory of in-absentia bans on incompetent defendants being tried).

34 Cf. Drope, 420 U.S. at 172 (explaining that defendant’s right to be present at trial requires that he be able to aid in his defense and understand proceedings against him); Recent Decision, Foreign Trials in Absentia: Due Process Objections to Unconditional Extradition, 13 STAN. L. REV. 370, 377 (1961) (discussing law of extradition and arguing that conviction in absentia cannot determine defendant’s guilt because it is too unreliable). See generally FED. R. CRIM. P. 43(a) (requiring presence of defendant at every stage of criminal justice process); Crosby v. United States, 506 U.S. 255, 256 (1993) (holding that Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 43 does not permit trial in absentia of defendant who escaped before trial and misses its commencement).

fundamental part of criminal procedure guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment. In Washington v. Texas, the Supreme Court found this right to be a fundamental component of due process of law protected by the Fourteenth Amendment.

Due process of law, as guaranteed by the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, also requires that defendants be able to assist in their own defense. Accordingly, defendants who cannot assist in their defense because of mental incapacity are incompetent to stand trial. In Pate v. Robinson, the Supreme Court found that trying an incompetent defendant violates his due process right to a fair trial.

Although competency is an elusive standard, the Supreme Court articulated a twofold definition in Dusky v. United States. First, defendants must have sufficient present ability to consult with a lawyer. In other words, the defendant must be able to assist in preparing a defense. Second, defendants must have a rational and factual understanding of the proceedings against them.

This definition effectively distinguishes legal incompetency to stand trial from legal insanity. A competency hearing emphasizes a

---

Through Selected ABA Standards Relating to Incompetence to Stand Trial, 53 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 375, 407 (1985) (arguing that not all proceedings, such as motions to dismiss and discovery, require presence of competent defendant to resolve issues fairly and accurately).

36 See U.S. CONST. amend. VI; Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14, 19 (1967) (explaining that right to confront witnesses and compel their appearance amounts to right to present defense, and finding this right fundamental); see also Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335, 342 (1963) (finding that Fourteenth Amendment incorporates fundamental provisions of Bill of Rights against states).

37 See Washington, 388 U.S. at 19 (declaring that right to present defense is fundamental component of due process of law).

38 See Dusky v. United States, 362 U.S. 402, 402 (1960) (establishing definition of competence requiring that defendant be able to assist in her defense); see also U.S. CONST. amend. V (stating that “[n]o person shall be . . . deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law”); U.S. CONST. amend. XIV, § 1 (stating that “nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law”).

41 See Dusky, 362 U.S. at 402.

42 See id.

43 See id.

44 Id.

defendant’s ability to aid in his own defense and to understand the proceedings. An insanity defense, by contrast, turns on a defendant’s criminal responsibility at the time of the crime. An insanity defense presupposes that a defendant is competent to stand trial and enter a plea. That is, when a defendant using an insanity defense enters his plea, he is competent to stand trial. When proffering an insanity defense, the defendant argues that although he is competent now, he was insane at the time of the crime.

The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment requires states to afford an incompetent defendant the right to avoid trial. Thus, a man charged with attempted rape can avoid trial if he is a paranoid schizophrenic and cannot understand the legal proceedings against him. However, due process does not require states to between finding defendant incompetent to stand trial and finding defendant not guilty by reason of insanity). Compare 18 U.S.C. § 4241(d) (2006) (providing definition of incompetence as unable to understand legal proceedings or to assist in preparing defense), with 18 U.S.C. § 17(a) (2006) (establishing affirmative insanity defense as defendant being unable to understand nature or wrongness of act during commission of crime).

46 See 18 U.S.C. § 4241(a) (authorizing competency hearing to determine if defendant has mental disease or defect rendering him unable to understand proceedings or assist in his defense); Medina, 505 U.S. at 448-49 (discussing difference between incompetence and insanity); Pate v. Robinson, 383 U.S. 375, 388-89 (1966) (Harlan, J., dissenting) (observing that test for incompetency is different from test used to determine criminal responsibility at time of crime).

47 See Medina, 505 U.S. at 448-49 (observing difference between incompetency determination and insanity defense); State v. Johnson, 399 A.2d 469, 471-76 (R.I. 1979) (tracing evolution of definition of insanity and legal tests for determining criminal responsibility). See generally United States v. Freeman, 357 F.2d 606 (2d Cir. 1966) (discussing history of legal determinations of insanity and providing detailed criticisms of various legal definitions).

48 See Medina, 505 U.S. at 449; McIntosh v. Pescor, 175 F.2d 95, 98 (6th Cir. 1949) (observing that jury hears insanity defense during trial, while competency to stand trial considers accused’s mental capacity to enter plea); Youtsey v. United States, 97 F. 937, 940 (6th Cir. 1899) (explaining that insane person cannot plead at arraignment, face trial, or receive judgment and punishment after conviction).

49 See Medina, 505 U.S. at 448.

50 See id.

51 See id. at 457 (Blackmun, J., dissenting) (explaining that right to trial while competent underpins defendant’s other rights in criminal trial); White v. Estelle, 459 U.S. 1118, 1120 (1983) (Marshall, J., dissenting) (explaining that Due Process Clause requires defendant to be competent as prerequisite to defendant’s trial); Pate, 383 U.S. at 387 (observing that defendant’s conviction could stand only if he was competent).

52 Cf. Williams v. State, 685 N.E.2d 730, 733-34 (Ind. Ct. App. 1997) (reversing defendant’s attempted rape conviction because trial court admitted into evidence deposition taken while he was incompetent).
recognize insanity as a defense.\textsuperscript{35} Similarly, states need not bear the burden of proving a defendant competent to stand trial.\textsuperscript{34} The Supreme Court ruled in \textit{Medina v. California} that due process allows states to place the burden of proving incompetency on a criminal defendant.\textsuperscript{35} For instance, in \textit{Medina}, the Court upheld a California statute providing for a per se presumption of competence.\textsuperscript{56}

Although states need not recognize insanity as a defense, common law and constitutional doctrine has long protected the right of incompetent defendants to avoid trial.\textsuperscript{57} Statutory law has mirrored this right.\textsuperscript{58} Title 18 U.S.C. § 4241 represents the federal codification of both common law and constitutional principles.\textsuperscript{59}

\textbf{B. 18 U.S.C. § 4241}

Congress promulgated the Insanity Defense Reform Act of 1984 in the wake of John Hinckley's attempted assassination of President Reagan.\textsuperscript{60} A jury had found Hinckley not guilty by reason of insanity, a \textsuperscript{35} See \textit{Medina}, 505 U.S. at 449; Powell v. Texas, 392 U.S. 514, 535-37 (1968) (finding that Constitution has never required particular mens rea, and refusing to define insanity test in constitutional terms); Andrew M. Levine, Note, \textit{Denying the Settled Insanity Defense: Another Necessary Step in Dealing with Drug and Alcohol Abuse}, 78 B.U. L. REV. 75, 83 (1998) (exploring dicta in two Supreme Court decisions suggesting that defendants do not have constitutional right to insanity defense).

\textsuperscript{34} But see \textit{Medina}, 505 U.S. at 458 (Blackmun, J., dissenting) (arguing that defendant's right to avoid trial while incompetent is so fundamental that it requires affirmative procedures to safeguard it).

\textsuperscript{35} Id. at 448 (majority opinion).

\textsuperscript{36} See id. at 442.

\textsuperscript{37} See Godinez v. Moran, 509 U.S. 389, 396 (1993) (acknowledging that only competent criminal defendant can proceed to trial); \textit{Medina}, 505 U.S. at 439 (recognizing that Due Process Clause of Fourteenth Amendment forbids prosecution of persons incompetent to stand trial); White v. Estelle, 459 U.S. 1118, 1121 (1983) (Marshall, J., dissenting) (explaining that Due Process Clause requires defendant to be competent before trial); Pate v. Robinson, 383 U.S. 375, 387 (1966) (observing that only if defendant was competent could his conviction stand).

\textsuperscript{59} See sources cited supra note 58.

\textsuperscript{60} See Phillip E. Johnson, \textit{The Turnabout in the Insanity Defense}, 6 CRIME & JUST. 221, 224 (1985) (explaining that verdict in Hinckley trial was likely cause for revolution in thinking about insanity defense); Shari N. Spitz, \textit{Psychiatric and Psychological Examinations for Sentencing: An Analysis of Caselaw from the Second Circuit in Comparison with Other Federal Circuits and the Governing Federal Statutes}, 6 verdict that incensed the public. \(^{61}\) In light of the public outcry regarding Hinckley’s verdict, Congress recognized a need to overhaul the legal determinations of insanity and competency. \(^{62}\) One provision of the Insanity Defense Reform Act, codified at 18 U.S.C. § 4241, specifically addresses the issue of competency. \(^{63}\)

Relying on the common law, § 4241 adopts the standard for competence that the Supreme Court articulated in Dusky v. United States. \(^{64}\) Section 4241(a) identifies which parties may challenge competency and on what grounds. \(^{65}\) Effectively, it authorizes any party in a criminal proceeding to bring a motion to determine the defendant’s competency. \(^{66}\) The court must grant the motion, or raise the issue on its own motion, if there is reasonable cause to believe that the defendant suffers from a mental disease or defect. \(^{67}\)

Subsection (a) identifies two definitions of mental disease or defect as grounds for the motion. \(^{68}\) First, defendants are incompetent if they are incapable of understanding the nature and consequences of the proceedings they face. \(^{69}\) Second, defendants are incompetent if they are incapable of assisting in their defense. Subsection (a) also establishes the right to a judicial hearing to determine a defendant's mental status, and subsection (b) provides for a psychiatric examination and report prior to any such hearing.

Section 4241(d) mandates hospitalization of defendants suffering from mental disease or defect and removes district courts' discretion in this determination. Subsection (d) requires a preponderance of the evidence to establish the defendant's competency, but does not allocate that burden to either party. The language of subsection (d) is silent regarding which party bears the burden of proof, and addresses only the evidentiary standard. The statute's silence on burden allocation mirrors a corresponding silence in the legislative history. The congressional record offers merely the language of the statute itself. Some circuit courts have attempted to fill the interpretive void with dicta from the Supreme Court. Thus, the question of which party bears the burden of proof in a competency hearing has no clear answer, and the circuits have split on that issue.

C. Cooper v. Oklahoma

Some circuits have looked to Supreme Court dicta for guidance in interpreting 18 U.S.C. § 4241. In Cooper v. Oklahoma, the Court evaluated the constitutionality of an Oklahoma statute requiring a defendant to prove incompetence by clear and convincing evidence. The Court found that placing such a high burden on the defendant is incompatible with the dictates of due process. In determining what due process required, the Court surveyed contemporary practices in state and federal jurisdictions. The Court found that forty-six federal and state jurisdictions did not impose the elevated “clear and convincing” standard on the defendant. In the context of competency hearings, such a standard would require the court to find that it is “highly probable” that a defendant is incompetent. A preponderance of the evidence standard, by comparison, would only require a court to find that it is “more likely than not” that a defendant is incompetent. Some jurisdictions placed no burden at all on the defendant, instead allocating it entirely to the prosecution.

The Cooper Court then observed that a defendant in a federal prosecution must prove incompetence by a preponderance of the evidence. This observation has generated confusion among district courts because it is anomalous in a case deciding what level of proof is necessary in competency proceedings. The Court’s statement appears in one sentence at the end of a paragraph in a decision about the level of proof.

In United States v. Dodds, an Arizona district court recognized the Supreme Court’s statement in Cooper as dicta and declined to follow

---

80 Cooper, 517 U.S. at 350.
81 Id. at 369.
82 Id. at 360.
83 Id. at 361.
85 See Ballentine’s Law Dictionary, supra note 84, at 980; Black’s Law Dictionary, supra note 84, at 1220; see also Restatement (Third) of Prop.: Donative Transfers §12.1 cmt. e (defining preponderance of evidence standard as needing to establish that it is more likely than not that assertion is true).
86 Cooper, 517 U.S. at 361-62.
87 Id. at 362.
89 See Cooper, 517 U.S. at 362.
Instead, the court applied the Ninth Circuit’s standard, which places the burden of proof on the Government. In United States v. Patel, a Massachusetts district court similarly declined to follow the Cooper dictum. The court in Patel found that because the Government must meet other prerequisites to trial, it also bore the burden of proving the defendant’s competence. Currently, therefore, circuit and district courts assign the burden of proof to a party without any systematic justification. Thus, the outcome of cases frequently depends not on a uniform system of ordered justice, but rather on the jurisdiction in which the hearing occurs.

D. Psychiatric Evidence and Burden Shifting

In contrast to the general confusion regarding burden allocation, no such controversy attaches to the admissibility of statements made during a psychological examination. In Estelle v. Smith, the Supreme Court acknowledged that the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination applies to pretrial psychiatric examinations. The Court found that the defendant had a right to know that his statements to a doctor would be admissible against him during a capital sentencing trial.

However, in Buchanan v. Kentucky, the Court limited Estelle’s holding to situations where the defendant does not initiate the 90 Dodds, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 13521, at *2 n.1.

---

91 Id. at *2; see also United States v. Hoskie, 950 F.2d 1388, 1392 (9th Cir. 1991) (noting that Government must prove competency by preponderance of evidence).
92 See Patel, 524 F. Supp. 2d at 114.
93 Id.
94 See id. at 110; Dodds, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 13521, at *2 n.1 (finding that Supreme Court language was dicta and instead following contrary Ninth Circuit holding).
95 See infra Part II (discussing split of authority).
97 See Estelle, 451 U.S. at 467-68 (noting that reasons for requiring warnings about right against self-incrimination during custodial interrogation apply with equal force during psychiatric examinations).
98 See id. at 469 (explaining that prosecution can only introduce defendant’s statements at trial if he knowingly waived Fifth Amendment rights).
psychiatric examination. In Buchanan, the Court found that defendants' statements are only inadmissible in situations where the defendants do not initiate psychiatric examinations. That is, even without a warning about the defendant's right to remain silent, if the defendant commences the examination, the statements are admissible. If the defendant did not seek the examination, the unwarned statements made during the examination are inadmissible. After Buchanan, defendants' decisions to place their own mental health at issue do not implicate the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination.

In addition to addressing pretrial psychiatric examinations, the Supreme Court has discussed burden-shifting procedures during pretrial proceedings. Notably, in Parke v. Raley, the Court validated a complex burden-shifting framework for challenging a prior conviction through a suppression motion. Kentucky's procedure involved proving the existence of a judgment on which it intended to rely. Once prosecutors proved the judgment existed, the burden shifted to the defendant. The defendant then had to establish an infringement of her rights or show that some other irregularity occurred in the earlier proceeding. After the defendant refuted the presumption of regularity, the burden shifted back to the Government. The Government then carried the burden of showing that the court entered the judgment in a manner protective of the defendant's rights.

---

99 See Buchanan, 483 U.S. at 422-23.
100 See id.
101 See id.
102 See id.
103 See id.
105 See id. at 29-30 (reviewing Raley's habeas corpus petition and upholding state court's presumption that prosecution validly obtained final judgment of conviction).
106 See id. at 24.
107 See id.
108 Id.
109 Id.
110 Id.
II. THE CIRCUIT SPLIT: UNITED STATES V. ROBINSON AND UNITED STATES V. HOSKIE

Given the morass of case law deriving from Cooper v. Oklahoma and the absence of clear congressional intent regarding competency hearings, confusion among circuit courts is unsurprising. In United States v. Robinson, the Fourth Circuit placed the burden of proving incompetency on the defendant. The Ninth Circuit, in United States v. Hoskie, placed the burden of showing competency on the Government.

A. United States v. Robinson

United States v. Robinson involved a juvenile offender who committed a string of armed robberies. After an initial arrest and release, fifteen-year-old Robinson continued to rob banks and grocery stores. After Robinson’s second arrest and subsequent confession, a clinical psychologist subjected him to a thorough psychiatric examination. Both the Government and defense counsel filed motions seeking psychiatric examinations. The psychologist determined that Robinson had an IQ of 70, and opined that he was competent to stand trial. At the ensuing hearing, the district court agreed and ordered him to stand trial. A jury convicted Robinson of nineteen counts of conspiracy and other charges related to armed robbery.

111 Compare Battle v. United States, 419 F.3d 1292, 1298 (11th Cir. 2005) (holding that defendant must demonstrate incompetency), and United States v. Robinson, 404 F.3d 850, 856 (4th Cir. 2005) (finding that defendant has burden of proving incompetency), with United States v. Hoskie, 950 F.2d 1388, 1392 (9th Cir. 1991) (holding that Government must prove competency by preponderance of evidence), United States v. Velasquez, 885 F.2d 1076, 1089 (3d Cir. 1989) (stating that Government bears burden of establishing competency), and United States v. Hutson, 821 F.2d 1015, 1018 (5th Cir. 1987) (holding that state bears burden of proving competency to stand trial).

112 See Robinson, 404 F.3d at 856 (relying on language from Cooper when addressing question of competency).

113 See Hoskie, 950 F.2d at 1392 (stating that Government bears burden but did not meet that burden).

114 Robinson, 404 F.3d at 852-53.

115 Id. at 834.

116 Id. at 835.

117 Id.

118 Id.

119 Id.

120 See id. at 855-56.
On appeal, Robinson challenged his conviction on the ground that he was not competent to stand trial.\(^{121}\) The court stated that federal law places on the defendant the burden of proving incompetence.\(^{122}\) The court cited both 18 U.S.C. § 4241(d) and Cooper v. Oklahoma for this proposition.\(^{123}\) Accordingly, the defendant had the burden to prove, by a preponderance of the evidence, that he suffered from a mental disease or defect.\(^{124}\)

The Fourth Circuit conceded that Robinson appeared to possess low intelligence and to suffer from several mental disorders.\(^{125}\) It noted that the lower court relied exclusively on the clinical psychologist’s testimony that Robinson was competent.\(^{126}\) Ultimately, however, the Fourth Circuit found that Robinson had not definitively produced any evidence to support a finding that he was incompetent.\(^{127}\) Thus, in the Fourth Circuit, the defendant must prove incompetency, regardless of which party injects the question of competency into the case.\(^{128}\)

B. United States v. Hoskie

In United States v. Hoskie, prosecutors charged Hoskie with several violent crimes.\(^{129}\) Hoskie filed a § 4241(a) motion, arguing that he was incompetent to stand trial.\(^{130}\) At the hearing, two psychologists concurred in testifying that Hoskie’s IQ was between 62 and 65, indicating mild mental retardation.\(^{131}\) However, the experts differed in their opinions as to Hoskie’s competence.\(^{132}\) The Government’s psychologist indicated that Hoskie was competent to stand trial; the defense psychologist indicated that he was not.\(^{133}\)

Given the conflicting expert testimony, the district court considered Hoskie’s inability to conceptualize or to think in abstract terms.\(^{134}\) It characterized his understanding of court proceedings as extremely

\(^{121}\) Id. at 856.

\(^{122}\) Id.

\(^{123}\) Id.

\(^{124}\) Id.

\(^{125}\) Id. at 858.

\(^{126}\) See id. at 857.

\(^{127}\) See id.

\(^{128}\) See id.

\(^{129}\) United States v. Hoskie, 950 F.2d 1388, 1389 (9th Cir. 1991).

\(^{130}\) Id.

\(^{131}\) Id.

\(^{132}\) Id.

\(^{133}\) See id. at 1389-90.

\(^{134}\) Id. at 1390.
limited, yet determined that he was minimally able to understand the process against him. It also found that he was able to assist in his defense through an interpreter. The court therefore found Hoskie competent to stand trial, and a jury convicted him.

On appeal, Hoskie again challenged his competence to stand trial, and the Ninth Circuit reversed his conviction on that ground. The court drew its definition of competence from 18 U.S.C. § 4241(d) and Dusky v. United States. The court then applied that definition to Hoskie, and determined that the district court committed clear error in finding that the Government met its burden of proof. The court concluded that no testimony refuted the defense's evidence of incompetence. The Ninth Circuit ruled that the district court erred in finding Hoskie competent to stand trial. The court thus placed the burden of proving competency on the Government, an allocation with which the Robinson court disagreed.

III. ANALYSIS

A burden-shifting regime resolves the split between Hoskie and Robinson, and is appropriate for three reasons. First, a burden-allocation procedure dependent on the identity of the moving party comports with Supreme Court precedent. Following Court precedent, either party is capable of bearing the burden of proof.

---

135 Id.
136 Id.
137 Id. at 1390-91.
138 Id. at 1391-92.
139 See id. at 1392.
140 Id.
141 Id. at 1394.
142 Id. at 1394-95.
143 See supra Part II.A (reviewing Robinson’s facts and holding).
144 See infra Part III.A (examining Supreme Court precedent and finding that burden allocation is consistent with Court case law); infra Part III.B (explaining that placing burden on defendant is permissible under Constitution and Supreme Court precedent); infra Part III.C (articulating argument that Government may constitutionally bear burden of proving competency).
146 See infra Part III.A.
Moreover, a burden-shifting procedure ensures adversarial proceedings where each party argues a position consistent with its interests. Second, the U.S. Constitution and Medina v. California indicate that the defendant may bear the burden of proof. Accordingly, the Robinson court correctly held that the burden of proof in a competency hearing may lie with the defendant. Due process does not prohibit the federal government from placing the burden of proof on the defendant. Finally, assigning the burden of proof to the Government is consistent with assigning other burdens to the Government. Thus, Hoskie correctly found that the Government may bear the burden of proof, although the court misallocated the burden of proof in that case. Because the defense brought the competency motion, it should have borne the burden of proof.

A. Allocating the Burden to the Party Raising the Competency Issue Comports with Supreme Court Precedent

Requiring the moving party to bear the burden of proof is consistent with Supreme Court precedent. In Buchanan v. Kentucky, the Supreme Court considered the admissibility of un-Mirandized statements made by a defendant during a psychiatric examination. In Buchanan, the Court found that a defendant’s statements to a psychiatrist may be admitted at trial when the defendant has initiated a psychiatric examination. That is, even without Miranda warnings about the defendant's right to remain silent, if the defendant seeks the examination, the statements he makes during the exam are 147 See infra Part III.A; see also ROBERT A. KAGAN, ADVERSARIAL LEGALISM: THE AMERICAN WAY OF LAW 3 (2003) (explaining that American legal system pits advocates against each other in contentious legal proceedings to resolve disputes).

---

148 See infra Part III.B.

149 See United States v. Robinson, 404 F.3d 850, 856 (4th Cir. 2005) (stating that defendant has burden of proving incompetency).

150 See infra Part III.B.

151 See infra Part III.C.

152 United States v. Hoskie, 950 F.2d 1388, 1392 (9th Cir. 1991) (holding that Government must show that defendant is competent to stand trial by preponderance of evidence); see infra Part III.C.

153 See Hoskie, 950 F.2d at 1389; infra Part III.C; see also infra Part III.B (explaining that defendant may constitutionally bear burden of proof).

154 Cf. infra Part III.B (arguing that defendant may bear burden under Medina and U.S. Constitution).

156 See id. at 422-23.
admissible. If the defendant did not initiate the examination, his statements during the psychiatric examination are inadmissible.

_Buchanan_ provides a framework for admitting or suppressing psychological evidence that depends on the identity of the moving party. A defendant's statements receive less protection if the defendant initiates the psychiatric examination. Allocating the burden of proof to a defendant who initiates a competency hearing is analogous to the Supreme Court's treatment of incriminating statements in _Buchanan_. Both procedures revolve around the identity of the moving party, and both impose substantive requirements on the moving party. Under _Buchanan_, if the state initiates a psychiatric examination, it must Mirandize the defendant. Under a burden allocation procedure, if the state initiates a competency hearing, it must bear the burden of proof in that hearing. Under _Buchanan_, if the defendant initiates a psychiatric examination, she risks having her statements admitted against her at trial. Under a burden allocation procedure, if the defendant moves for a competency hearing, the defendant must similarly bear the burden of proof. Conditioning the burden of proof on the moving party is therefore consistent with _Buchanan_.

---

157 See id.
158 See id.
159 See id.
160 See id.
161 See id. See generally Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. 454, 469 (1981) (finding Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination applies to criminal defendant's statements made during psychiatric examination); Bennett, supra note 35, at 398 (discussing possible approaches to burden allocation).
162 See _Buchanan_, 483 U.S. at 422-23 (explaining that ability of prosecution to introduce statements from psychiatric examination depends on whether defendant initiated examination); Bennett, supra note 35, at 398 (noting general legal principle that party raising issue bears burden of proof on that issue); cf. Bradley Scott Shannon, _Action Is an Action Is an Action Is an Action_, 77 Wash. L. Rev. 65, 125-26 (2002) (describing identity of moving party as major difference between motions to dismiss and other dispositive motions).
163 See _Buchanan_, 483 U.S. at 422.
164 Cf. infra Part III.C (arguing that state may bear burden of proof).
165 See _Buchanan_, 483 U.S. at 422-23 (explaining that defendant has no Fifth Amendment privilege against introduction of statements when defendant requests psychiatric examination).
166 Cf. infra Part III.B (arguing that it is constitutional to place burden of proof on defendant).
167 Cf. Drope v. Missouri, 420 U.S. 162, 174 (1975) (recognizing that states have power to shift individual and Government burdens in post conviction proceedings); infra Part III.B (explaining that burden-allocating rule is consistent with Fifth and
However, some may argue that a burden-shifting rule undermines the stability of hearings. According to this argument, assigning a burden to a party based solely on which party raises the competency issue may be destabilizing and unfair. Generally, uniform presumptions of competence or incompetence allow parties to predict the challenges of their roles and to plan their tactics accordingly. Some may further object that while courts regularly suppress evidence, such suppression creates less instability than a burden-shifting rule.

The argument that burden shifting destabilizes court hearings necessarily fails. In Parke v. Raley, the Supreme Court validated a procedure that shifts the burden between the Government and defendant twice during the same proceeding. However, a rule placing the burden of proof on the moving party under 18 U.S.C.

---

Fourteenth Amendments and Medina); infra Part III.C (arguing that burden-shifting procedure reaches better, more logically consistent outcomes).

170 Cf. FED. R. EVID. 301 (providing that presumptions in civil cases leave burden of persuasion on original party even if burden of production shifts); Yablon, infra note 168, at 234 (describing how burden of proof creates presumption that can bring uniformity and stability to fact-finding process); Martin McHenry, Note, Federal Rule of Evidence 301 and Congressional Acts: When Does an Act "Otherwise Provide", 67 CORNELL L. REV. 1085, 1085 (1982) (explaining that presumptions are important because they can affect outcome of trial by shifting burden of proof). But see Morgan, infra note 168, at 280 (describing presumptions as causing confusion, error, and potential for error).

171 Cf. Yablon, infra note 168, at 234 (concluding that presumption may function as cognitive frame, bringing greater uniformity and predictability to complex and uncertain factual inquiries). See generally GEORGE FISHER, EVIDENCE (2d ed. 2008) (arguing that purpose of evidence rules is to limit flow of information to jury).

172 See generally Parke v. Raley, 506 U.S. 20 (1992) (detailing procedure for challenging conviction that shifts burden of proof numerous times); Drope, 420 U.S. at 174 (recognizing state's authority to shift individual and government burdens in proceedings after defendant's conviction).

§ 4241(a) provides even greater stability than the Parke procedure.¹⁷⁴ Such a rule does not shift the burden during a proceeding.¹⁷⁵ Instead, the burden attaches only if a party brings a § 4241(a) motion.¹⁷⁶ The party controls the burden through its decision to bring the motion.¹⁷⁷ Similarly, the motion does not disadvantage the opposing party because the filer bears the burden of proof.¹⁷⁸ Therefore, the proposed procedure is simpler and provides greater certainty than the burden-shifting framework the Supreme Court validated in Parke.¹⁷⁹

Moreover, a rule allocating the burden to the moving party ensures that each party is arguing for its interests.¹⁸⁰ The party bringing a § 4241(a) motion wishes to prove the defendant incompetent to stand trial.¹⁸¹ The opposing party should want to prove the defendant competent to stand trial.¹⁸² Without a burden-allocating rule, the ¹⁷⁴ See id.; see also infra Part III.C (explaining that proposed burden allocation procedure would have resulted in more persuasive and logically consistent outcome); cf. Drope, 420 U.S. at 174 (observing that states have power to shift individual and government burdens).

¹⁷⁶ But cf. Brown v. Warden, 682 F.2d 348, 349 (2d Cir. 1982) (holding that once defendant has called competency into question, burden shifts to prosecution to prove competency). See generally 18 U.S.C. § 4241(a) (authorizing any party to bring motion to determine competency); id. § 4247(d) (2006) (establishing procedures for hearings brought pursuant to Title 18).

¹⁷⁷ Cf. infra Part III.B (arguing that placing burden of proof on defendant is constitutional); infra Part III.C (illuminating reasons why government may bear burden of proof).

¹⁷⁸ Cf. infra Part III.B (explaining that Constitution allows placement of burden of proof on defendant); infra Part III.C (arguing that Government may bear burden of proof).

¹⁷⁹ Cf. infra Part III.C (explaining that burden allocation procedure would have reached more consistent outcome than uniform allocation in face of conflicting expert testimony).

¹⁸⁰ See infra note 185 and accompanying text.

¹⁸¹ See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. § 4241(a) (authorizing any party to challenge defendant’s competency); United States v. Robinson, 404 F.3d 850 (4th Cir. 2005) (showing that defendant brought motion to challenge his own competency); United States v. Hoskie, 950 F.2d 1388 (9th Cir. 1991) (detailing how defendant brought three motions to challenge competency).

¹⁸² See, e.g., United States v. McDade, 263 F. App’x 324, 326 (4th Cir. 2008) (showing that defendant and Government had expert witnesses offering opposing opinions regarding defendant’s competency); United States v. Wiggin, 429 F.3d 31, Government might bring a motion to determine incompetence in a jurisdiction that requires it to prove the defendant's competence. The Government would subsequently have to prove that the defendant is competent even though it brought the motion challenging the defendant's competence. Such a situation violates the canon of statutory construction against illogical outcomes. It also runs counter to the American legal credo that the adversarial process is the best vehicle through which to arrive at the truth.

B. Allocating the Burden of Competency to a Defendant Correctly
Construes the U.S. Constitution and Medina v. California

Burden shifting may allocate the burden either to the Government or to a federal defendant, both of whom may constitutionally bear such a burden. In Robinson, the Fourth Circuit held that the 34-35 (1st Cir. 2005) (noting that Government put on forensic psychologist to rebut defendant's proof of incompetence); United States v. Baker, 807 F.2d 1315, 1317-18 (6th Cir. 1986) (explaining that defendant argued on appeal that he was not incompetent and that his attorney should have objected to Government's proof of incompetence).

183 See, e.g., Hoskie, 950 F.2d at 1392 (holding that Government must establish defendant's competence by preponderance of evidence); United States v. Velasquez, 885 F.2d 1076, 1089 (3d Cir. 1989) (stating that Government must establish competency); United States v. Hutson, 821 F.2d 1015, 1018 (5th Cir. 1987) (holding that state bears burden of proving competency to stand trial).

184 Cf. sources cited supra note 183.

185 See, e.g., Small v. United States, 544 U.S. 385, 404 (2005) (Thomas, J., dissenting) (explaining that canon against absurdities applies where result of following plain language would be genuinely absurd); Pub. Citizen v. U.S. Dep't of Justice, 491 U.S. 440, 470 (1989) (Kennedy, J., concurring) (stating that courts should follow plain language of statute unless doing so would lead to patently absurd consequences); FBI v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615, 640 (1982) (O'Connor, J., dissenting) (arguing that Court may reject plain language of statute when such language would lead to absurd consequences).

187 See infra Part III.C (explaining that Government may bear burden); see also Hoskie, 950 F.2d at 1392 (finding that Government has burden to prove competency).
defendant in a federal prosecution bore the burden of proving his incompetence to stand trial.\textsuperscript{188} There, Robinson raised his mental status as a defense.\textsuperscript{189} Accordingly, the court reached the correct outcome, but without any supporting rationale linking the burden to the moving party.\textsuperscript{190}

The Fourteenth Amendment permits placing the burden of proof on a defendant in a state proceeding.\textsuperscript{191} Such an allocation does not violate the defendant's due process rights under the Fourteenth Amendment.\textsuperscript{192} In \textit{Medina v. California}, the Supreme Court ruled that a state may allocate the burden of proof to a defendant.\textsuperscript{193} In \textit{Medina}, the Court discussed the power of a state to assign the burdens of producing evidence and persuasion.\textsuperscript{194} The Court reasoned that such power is not subject to proscription under the Due Process Clause unless it offends a fundamental principle of justice.\textsuperscript{195} Assigning the burden of proof to a defendant is not such an offense.\textsuperscript{196} A similar burden allocation at the federal level would not offend a fundamental

---

\textsuperscript{188} United States v. Robinson, 404 F.3d 850, 856 (4th Cir. 2005).

\textsuperscript{189} \textit{Id.} at 856.

\textsuperscript{190} See \textit{id.}

\textsuperscript{192} \textit{Medina}, 505 U.S. at 453.

\textsuperscript{193} See \textit{id.} at 447.

\textsuperscript{194} See \textit{id.} at 445-46.

\textsuperscript{195} See \textit{id.} at 446.

\textsuperscript{196} See \textit{id.; see also} Patterson v. New York, 432 U.S. 197, 201-02 (1977) (finding that state regulations are subject to proscription under due process only when they offend fundamental principles of justice); Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513, 523 (1958) (stating that it is within state’s powers to regulate procedures for carrying out its laws unless doing so offends nation’s traditions and conscience).
principle of justice.\textsuperscript{197} Therefore, under \textit{Medina}, a federal statute may allocate the burden of proof to a criminal defendant.\textsuperscript{198}

The U.S. Constitution similarly permits the allocation of the burden of proof to a federal defendant.\textsuperscript{199} Although the Court has been silent on allocating the burden to a federal defendant, it has held that Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment protections are equivalent.\textsuperscript{200} The Fourteenth Amendment protects defendants from state infringement of due process rights.\textsuperscript{201} The Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause similarly protects defendants from federal infringement of their rights.\textsuperscript{202} The protections of the Fifth Amendment are coextensive with the protections of the Fourteenth Amendment.\textsuperscript{203} Therefore, because a \textsuperscript{197} But see \textit{Medina}, 505 U.S. at 453-54 (O’Connor, J., concurring) (arguing that courts must balance historical analysis against considerations of fairness in operation to determine due process violations); Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12, 20-21 (1956) (Frankfurter, J., concurring) (describing due process as most changeable concept in law and most reflective of progressive society); Bennett, supra note 35, at 399 (outlining argument that incompetent defendants cannot prove anything and therefore cannot prove competence while potentially incompetent).

\textsuperscript{198} See \textit{Medina}, 505 U.S. at 453 (holding that California law placing burden of proof on defendant does not violate due process, which only requires most basic procedural safeguards); cf. supra Part III.A (explaining that burden allocation procedure is consistent with Supreme Court precedent). See generally U.S. \textbf{CONST.} amend. XIV (protecting against state deprivation of rights without due process of law).

\textsuperscript{199} See \textit{Cooper} v. Oklahoma, 517 U.S. 348, 362 (1996) (stating in dicta that Congress has placed burden on accused); cf. Garcia v. San Antonio Metro. Transit Auth., 469 U.S. 528, 550 (1985) (explaining that state sovereignty does not offer guidance regarding line between state and federal power); supra Part III.A (concluding that federal statute may allocate burden of proof to either party).

\textsuperscript{202} See U.S. \textbf{CONST.} amend. V.

\textsuperscript{203} See \textit{Malloy} v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1, 8 (1964) (explaining that Fourteenth Amendment prohibits state invasions of same privileges that Fifth Amendment state may constitutionally place the burden of proof on a defendant, the federal government may do so as well.\textsuperscript{204} Notably, the Due Process Clauses in the two amendments use identical language.\textsuperscript{205} As the Court has explained, to read the same phrases differently in different amendments would be untenable.\textsuperscript{206}

C. Allocating the Burden of Competency to the Government Is Consistent with Placing Other Burdens on the Government

Although the defendant may bear the burden of proof, the Constitution does not mandate such an allocation in all situations.\textsuperscript{207} The Government may bear the burden of proof when it challenges the defendant's competency.\textsuperscript{208} In \textit{United States v. Hoskie}, the Ninth Circuit acknowledged that the Government may bear the burden of proof, and assigned it to the Government in that case.\textsuperscript{209} Such allocation to the Government is consistent with assigning other burdens to the Government.\textsuperscript{210} Additionally, requiring the Government to establish a \textsuperscript{204} Cf. Malloy, 378 U.S. at 8; Malinski, 324 U.S. at 415 (Frankfurter, J., concurring); supra Part III.A (arguing that burden-shifting procedure is consistent with Supreme Court precedent that places burden on defendant).

\textsuperscript{205} See Hurtado, 110 U.S. at 534 (reading parity of language in Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments as meaning that they contain same substance); Israel, supra note 200, at 321-22 (summarizing Hurtado's argument to Court that Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments have identical language and must contain same requirements). Compare U.S. Const. amend. V, with U.S. Const. amend. XIV.

\textsuperscript{206} See, e.g., United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218, 224 (1967) (observing that law enforcement involves critical confrontations at pretrial proceedings which can turn \textsuperscript{207} Cf. supra Part III.A (arguing that burden-shifting framework that is dependent on identity of moving party comports with Supreme Court precedent).

\textsuperscript{209} See United States v. Hoskie, 950 F.2d 1388, 1392 (9th Cir. 1991) (stating that Government has burden to prove competency).
defendant’s competency is logical and consistent with the canon of statutory construction prohibiting illogical outcomes.211

Requiring the Government to prove a defendant competent to stand trial is consistent with imposing other pretrial obligations on the government.212 Before trying a defendant, the Government must obtain arrest warrants and grand jury indictments.213 The Government must also prove a defendant’s guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, the most stringent standard available in the criminal justice system.214 Accordingly, the Hoskie court correctly found that the burden of proof under 18 U.S.C. § 4241 may rest with the Government.215

Although the Government may bear the burden of proof, the Ninth Circuit erred in so allocating the burden in Hoskie.216 The Government should not have borne the burden because Hoskie, not the 2009] An Incompetent Jurisprudence 709
Government, raised the issue.\textsuperscript{217} Placing the burden on the defendant would have resolved the conflicting expert testimony and exposed the Government's failure to refute Hoskie's incompetence.\textsuperscript{218}

The psychological experts concurred in diagnosing Hoskie's low intelligence, but disagreed about its consequences.\textsuperscript{219} In light of this disagreement, the court's finding that the Government proved more likely than not that Hoskie was competent is illogical.\textsuperscript{220} A logical ruling from the court would have concluded that Hoskie failed to prove more likely than not that he was incompetent.\textsuperscript{221} A burden-allocating procedure would have reached a better, more consistent outcome than the lower court reached.\textsuperscript{222}

However, some argue that the Supreme Court has already decided which party bears the burden of proof under 18 U.S.C. § 4241.\textsuperscript{223} In Cooper v. Oklahoma, the Court mentioned in dicta that Congress has placed the burden of proving incompetence on the accused.\textsuperscript{224} The Court compared § 4241 to Oklahoma's statute requiring the defendant to prove incompetence by clear and convincing evidence.\textsuperscript{225} The Court explained that the vast majority of states, as well as the federal

\footnotesize
\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{217} See Hoskie, 950 F.2d at 1391-92.
\item \textsuperscript{218} See Medina v. California, 505 U.S. 437, 455 (1992) (O'Connor, J., concurring); Hoskie, 950 F.2d at 1389, 1392. See generally Ballentine's Law Dictionary, supra note 84, at 980 (defining preponderance of evidence standard).
\item \textsuperscript{219} See Hoskie, 950 F.2d at 1389, 1392-93 (describing conflicting expert testimony).
\item \textsuperscript{221} Cf. Medina, 505 U.S. at 455 (O'Connor, J., concurring) (explaining that indeterminate psychiatric examination will generally benefit defendant). See generally Hoskie, 950 F.2d at 1392 (holding that district court committed clear error in finding that Government met its burden); Black's Law Dictionary, supra note 84, at 1220 (defining preponderance of evidence standard as requiring proof of fact's existence more likely than not).
\item \textsuperscript{222} See Hoskie, 950 F.2d at 1392 (holding that district court committed clear error in finding that Government met its burden); cf. Medina, 505 U.S. at 455 (O'Connor, J., concurring); United States v. Brown, No. 07-CR-202 (JBW), 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 75105, at *4-5 (E.D.N.Y. Oct. 10, 2007) (detailing procedure where once defendant has made prima facie showing of incompetence, burden shifts to Government to prove defendant's competence).
\item \textsuperscript{223} See Cooper v. Oklahoma, 517 U.S. 348, 362 (1996).
\item \textsuperscript{224} See id.
\item \textsuperscript{225} See id.
\end{itemize}
government, used the lower preponderance of the evidence standard. In mentioning § 4241, the Court stated that the statute required the accused to prove incompetence by a preponderance of the evidence.

Nevertheless, the Court's statement in Cooper is dictum. The Court's reference to § 4241 was unnecessary to the outcome because Cooper decided only the evidentiary standard to apply in state statutes. The Court referred to the federal system only to note that the federal system had a lower burden in competency hearings. Furthermore, several federal courts have recognized the statement as dictum and have allocated the burden under § 4241 to the Government.

CONCLUSION

The burden of establishing incompetency should rest with whichever party brings the motion to determine competence under 18 U.S.C. § 4241(a). Allocating the burden of proof to the party raising the competency issue comports with Supreme Court precedent. Such a procedure is analogous to the Court's treatment of the admissibility of psychological evidence and is more stable than other burden-shifting procedures that the Court has already validated. Additionally, allowing either party to bear the burden of proof also avoids illogical outcomes from following the plain language of the statute. By ensuring that each party argues for its interests, attaching the burden to whichever party brings the motion honors the American

---

226 See id. at 361.
227 See id.
229 See Patel, 524 F. Supp. 2d at 111.
230 Id.; see also Cooper, 517 U.S. at 362.
232 See supra Part III (analyzing circuit split and case law for reasons why Supreme Court should adopt burden-shifting procedure).
233 See supra Part III A.
235 See supra Part III C.
tradition of adversarial legalism. Allocating the burden to a defendant correctly construes the U.S. Constitution and Medina v. California. The Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments allow placing the burden of proof on a defendant in a federal prosecution. Moreover, the Supreme Court has validated placing the burden on criminal defendants. Allocating the burden to the Government is consistent with making it establish other prerequisites to trial. Therefore, the burden of proof should fall on the party bringing the motion to determine competency.

236 See supra Part III.A.
237 See supra Part III.B.
238 See supra Part III.B.
239 See supra Part III.B.
240 See supra Part III.C.
241 See supra Part III.